

Mariusz Treliński

Director

A benchmark production...a hallucinatory nightmare...Treliński walks the razor's edge between the explicit and the implied, and he does it so well that we are soon unsure of what we have seen. Did that wallpaper just move? Is that a vision of Christ or a demon? Is she mad, or are we? A heady mix of drugs and psychosis in an underworld of glittery perversion sucks us all into Renata's vortex

Director Mariusz Treliński brings both classical and contemporary aesthetics to opera productions, his background as a film director informing unique cinematic interpretations of the repertoire. He receives frequent invitations from prestigious opera houses across the world and has served as Artistic Director of Polish National Opera since 2008.

Treliński made his operatic debut in 1996, when he was commissioned by the Warsaw Autumn Festival to direct Elżbieta Sikora's Heartsnatcher, which was subsequently staged at the Pompidou Centre in Paris. He made his breakthrough in 1999 with his production of Puccini's Madama Butterfly for Polish National Opera, which was staged around the world, including in Washington, St Petersburg, Valencia and Tel Aviv, marking the start of his international career.

Since then his productions have been presented across the globe, often with more than one in production at a time. His 2015 Warsaw premiere of Thomas Adès's Powder Her Face, developed in association with La Monnaie, was shown at Halles de Schaerbeek in Brussels, at the same time that he opened Wagner's Tristan and Isolde at the Metropolitan Opera, which was subsequently shown in Baden-Baden, Warsaw, New York and Beijing. It was due to return to New York in 2020 but was cancelled due to the Coronavirus crisis.

As an award-winning film director and graduate of Łódź Film School, Treliński often draws on the style and techniques of classic movies, and uses innovative lighting and camera angles. His 2010 production of Verdi's La traviata paid homage to Bob Fosse's film All That Jazz to create a vivid modern interpretation, in a production that consolidated his position as one of the great contemporary opera directors.

Invoking the poetry and visuals of horror movies, he brought together Tchaikovsky's Iolanta and Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle in an inventive and complementary double bill for a 2015 co-production between Polish National Opera and Metropolitan Opera, starring Anna Netrebko and Nadja Michael. Iolanta was also shown as part of the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino festival at the Opera di Firenze in April 2016. His 2018 production of Prokofiev's expressionist work The Fiery Angel created a sensation at Festival d'Aix and Polish National Opera, conducted by Kazushi Ono and Bassem Akiki.

Since his 1999 production of La traviata, Trelński has collaborated exclusively with stage designer Boris Kudlička. He has worked with the world's leading conductors, including Daniel Barenboim, Kent Nagano, Lorin Maazel, Simon Rattle, Kazushi Ono, Valery Gergiev and Carlo Rizzi.

In the centenary year of Korngold's Die tote Stadt he radically reworked his new production at La Monnaie at short notice in the face of the crisis, refilming videos and restaging it to make it safe. Current and future plans include a new production of Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov at Polish National Opera, a co-production with NNTT, as well as La Forza del Destino for Polish National Opera and the MET.
